Lewis Carroll has been telling another modern fairy tale to those three fortunate young ladies who have him for their fabulist, and now the result lies before us in a charming Christmas book, where those thousands of children of a larger or smaller growth who have laughed over the adventures of Alice, that most delightful of little girls, may follow their heroine through. The realm of marvels which she visits on this occasion is Looking-glass House, part of which she has often seen in the drawing-room; but her curiosity is strongly excited about the rest.
