The psychological effects of our childhood experiences can have an outsized impact on who we become later in life. Earlier today, I read an article that provoked what one might describe as a panic attack. As I read this very disturbing article about the psychological ramifications of growing up fatherless, it all just sunk in for me that I was damaged. My state of mind was completely altered when I finished reading about the scientific studies on fatherless sons. Unfortunately, I have personally experienced many of the psychological consequences mentioned in the article. Most alarming for me was of course change comes for literally everyone, as news of Kennedy being shot fills the airwaves and the uncertainty moving forward becomes much more explicit. Published. Watching them endure, however, inevitably means watching them sit in front of the TV a lot. Two of my TV-critic betters (Seipinwall and Todd VanDerWerff) felt the episode suffered somewhat for this, as it’s hard to turn characters watching TV into something compelling. While I agree to a certain extent this wasn’t one of the season’s truly great episodes not a problem that I personally encountered. I wonder if this has something to do with the mere fact that I have far less exposure to television, and not that well-versed in the iconography of this seminal moment. The age of 18 is widely accepted as the start of adulthood but those one or two years younger occupy a strange twilight zone where they are given many freedoms and responsibilities but denied others. The Scottish government has just published its plans to allow 16- and 17 year-olds to vote in next year’s independence referendum. For some it will help fuel the long-standing debate over whether the voting age should be lowered to 16 across the UK.
