Modern dictionaries are divided into types according to their contents. There are general and special dictionaries. General dictionaries deal with the words of a language as a whole. We also refer to general dictionaries translating dictionaries, such as English-Russian, Russian-English and others which do not define the words they list. Special dictionaries may be subdivided according to the sphere of human activity in which they are used or the functional variant of the language: technical dictionaries, medical dictionaries, dictionaries of law terms, etc; dialect dictionaries, dictionaries of slang. Some modern linguists define linguistic field research as follows: Linguistic field research or fieldwork is the collection of linguistic data outside of a laboratory, library or workplace setting, and it is also the process of observing systematically the informants in the chosen survey locations and studying the linguistic data from the observation. The approaches and methods used in field research vary across disciplines with sociology, sociopsychology, anthropology, dialectology, economics, etc. for instance. However, some world linguists believe that it is a mixture of Western modern anthropology and linguistics, and it was translated into Chinese in the 1920s.
