In this case, the choice is almost always Budget 1. And when I ask, “Which would be best for motivating performance?” the majority of participants usually select Budget 2. As this example shows, budgets can be used both for planning (Number 1) and for control (Number 2), although the same budget is not always optimal for both purposes. Occasionally a company uses a budget with “stretch” in it for motivating performance, for instance, and a more “realistic” budget for planning, for example. But no matter whether it is used for planning or for control, a budget is more than a forecast. A forecast is a prediction of what may happen and sometimes contains prescriptions for dealing with future events.
