Although the nineteenth-century fashion press began as a national industry participated in the perpetuation of normative gender roles, focusing on representation: are the images presented in the popular a more complex narrative regarding the intersection of gender, class, consumption, and fashion.
The gender politics of sight and visibility in nineteenth-century France are also outlined by the female artist Mary Cassatt in The Opera (1877). The woman in the immediate foreground peers through her opera glasses (presumably to better see the performers on stage), while in the background, a man can be seen using his glasses, not to watch the performance, but to spy on the women in the boxes around him. Women started to push back against their prescribed gender roles toward the end of the nineteenth century, and called for more liberty and socio-political rights. As female gender roles began to change, the figure of the New Woman—an educated, independent career woman—emerged. Many men were wary of the New Woman and the autonomy she demanded.
