There is evidence of the African presence in London, England, from Roman times to the present day. Burials at Roman London's cemeteries have revealed that the settlement was a "a highly multicultural society". Using bioarchaeology, DNA analysis and the examination of grave goods archaeologists at the Museum of London have identified a number of burials of people with "black African ancestry" who had both travelled to and were born in London during the Roman period. British Black English is largely a British West Indian creole, which will have developed from various pidgins as a lingua franca enabling communication between the three main ethnic groups there: the dominant English of the slave-owners, the many different African languages spoken by the imported slaves, and the Taino languages of the original islanders. By the eighteenth century, there were large numbers of black people in Britain, who took the 7 Nigel File and Chris Power, Black Settlers in Britain 1555-1958 (London, 1981); The Gentleman's Magazine, xxxiv (1764), p. 495, rubric Short Notes from the Papers.
