Social work practice with adolescents involves working not just with the adolescents but also with their families, schools, and neighborhoods. Helping adolescents to confront adversity and develop mechanisms that promote resiliency is critical, especially for adolescents who are at risk of emotional or behavioral problems. There is a wide range of effective interventions in working with adolescents experiencing internalizing disorders, externalizing disorders, or substance abuse disorders. Presents a meta-systems approach to overcome system problems and improve mental health outcomes for children and adolescents. It highlights the need to include families, cultural norms and values, and service sectors in order to address disparities and optimize outcomes for youth.
