In addition, I asked several scholars to examine my data on insurgencies that were in their areas of expertise. I am grateful to the following people for providing their input, and for making several improvements to the original data set. All errors that remain are my own.

Is military power something that can be studied using static measures like force ratios, or does it require a more dynamic analysis? How should analysts evaluate the role of doctrine, or politics, or military strategy in determining the appropriate balance? What role should formal modeling play in formulating defense policy? What is the place for empirical analysis, and what are the strengths and limitations of existing data?[1]. It is well worth the time to revisit the contributions to the 1980s debate. I have included a bibliography below that is not exhaustive, but is a place to start.
