Firstly, free movement of labour depends on the area in question. To make an easy contrast, initially, the EU was free movement of workers between 12 / 15 countries in Western Europe. These countries had relatively similar wage rates, and we didn’t see any dramatic shift in workers between EU member states. The argument is that, if you allow large net flows of workers from low wage countries, these workers will be willing to bid down wages and the increase in the supply of labour will lead to a fall in wages of native-born workers. This is particularly the case for unskilled workers who are closer substitutes for immigrant labour.
